“The whispers of the Bloodthorne have woven themselves into the very fabric of my being, guiding my every thought like a dark thread in a tapestry.”

Morgath, the Elderwood Scourge

Before they could react, Morgath lunged, the forest responding in kind. Vines erupted from the earth, ensnaring their legs and dragging them to the ground. Panic erupted as they fought against the encroaching darkness, but. With each precise strike of his spear, he spreads the Bloodthorne's corruption, turning their screams into a cacophony of terror. The soldiers had thought themselves safe, but here, in the heart of the Elderwood, there was no sanctuary. Morgath reveled in the chaos, a master of the hunt, as the last echoes of resistance faded into the night, swallowed by the shadows he commanded.

As the last soldier fell, Morgath stood amidst the wreckage, the acrid scent of sweat and fear mingling with the damp earth. The forest seemed to pulse with life around him, vines curling back into the ground as if in reverence to their master. He could feel the Bloodthorne's power thrumming through his veins, an intoxicating rush that filled the void of his former self.

The night was his, and the Thorne thrummed with anticipation within him, eager for the next offering to its insatiable hunger.

“Where she walks, life twists, and flesh rots.
She is the forest’s wrath, root and claw, shadow and silence. Despair, for the Seed of Sorrow has come.”

The forest whispered her name, though no living soul remembered it. Ilyanna stepped from the shadows, her bark-covered limbs creaking, monstrous claws gleaming in the moonlight. Only her elven face remained of who she had been, now a mask of eerie calm. Behind her, a shambling horde of spore-twisted husks followed, their dead eyes vacant, bound to her will.

Ahead, the village clung to hope, its defenders gripping weapons behind makeshift barricades, believing the essence crystal's glow would keep them safe. They were wrong.

She struck without warning, claws slicing through steel and flesh alike. The defenders fell in moments, their screams smothered by whispering spores that twisted dying men into her thralls. When the last of them lay silent, she turned to the crystal. It pulsed defiantly, its light casting faint shadows over her towering form. She hesitated. A flicker of memory surfaced. Hands that once healed instead of destroyed. And a question: Why? The thought barely formed before the Bloodthorne's will surged through her, drowning it out, replacing doubt with purpose.

To free him.
